Spalding baseball bat hit a $360 bid at Leonard's

BY NANCY KELLY

TOLEDO, Ohio — Leonard's Auction recently hosted an outstanding antique, early American, and folk art auction. Many items from the 18th and 19th centuries provided a glimpse into life during a simpler time. This sale offered a chance to purchase art and other useful items that had stood the test of time, were well made, and attractive. Prices listed here do not include the buyer's premium.

Sports fans were offered a treat when the vintage 1920s/30s Spalding Premier Model 151 wood baseball bat crossed the block. The knob bore the "Spalding Trade Mark" stamp inside the baseball logo, the grip was neatly taped, and it came complete with original canvas sleeve. The 32.5-inch-long bat was in very good condition and was claimed with a final bid of $360.

Right: A vintage 1920s/30s Spalding Premier Model 151 wood baseball bat complete with original canvas sleeve in very good condition was claimed with a final bid of $360.

Handmade quilts are always a popular item. Two at this sale showcased the Grandmother's Flower Garden traditional pattern. The style consists of six-sided hexagonal blocks staggered to give the appearance of a honeycomb, each with a flower inside. The first one measured 78 by 86 inches and was in excellent, clean condition with no flaws or damage. It finished with a final bid of $290. A narrower one also in great condition closed at $235.

Right: A single 14 inch diameter antique yellowware stoneware pottery mixing or serving bowl with a delicate blue seaweed pattern closed at $120.

Pottery folk art was well received in various forms including a couple of humorous pieces. An 11-inch-tall Chester Hewell folk art glazed redware southern pottery ugly face jug displayed a distorted face with large eyes and a scowling expression. The artist's signature was etched into the pottery under the base, the finish was a glossy black glaze, and there was a large handle on the back of the head. This grim character was claimed with a high bid of $275. A 6-inch tall redware ugly face spittoon signed by artist Michael Crocker was done in a similar style. The rough gray glazed pitcher-like item with side handle was topped by a 6-inch-wide basin that could function quite well as a spittoon. It also bore the artist's signature etched into the clay. It was

Aprons move from covering to collectible

BY LARRY LEMASTERS

Historically, aprons have been used by cooks since the 12th century. But the heyday of the apron is from the 1940s through the 1960s when every cook in America wore one. Aprons were so popular that on television, housewives such as June Cleaver and Alice Kramden and even Aunt Bee on The Andy Griffith Show wore them all the time in an effort to appear feminine and fashionable.

Today, aprons are as popular as ever, but not with housewives. Today, if an apron is worn around the home at all, it is usually at a barbeque, and dad wears it as he slow cooks ribs. The group that has renewed apron's popularity once again is collectors.

Many of the vintage aprons collected were rehomed with a final bid of $65. On the more useful side, an antique yellowware blue band stoneware pottery mixing and serving bowl set consisted of six pieces ranging from the largest at 9 inches in diameter down to the smallest at 4.5 inches. The set closed at $180. A single 14-inch diameter antique yellowware stoneware pottery mixing or serving bowl with a delicate blue seaweed pattern inside the blue and white band closed at $120 despite some age crazing. A vintage Dutch Delft ceramic vase with numerous spouts would allow tulips to be supported and shown individually. The underside had the words "Delft Handwerx Holland" written along with the drawing of a fish. It stood 8 inches tall and was decorated with intricate drawings of flowers in blue, yellow, red, and green. A final bid of $80 claimed it.

Mixed in with the vintage art, a very contemporary piece also left its mark. A 9-inch-tall Sun Person sculpture created by Stan Bitters was created in terracotta glazed earthenware. As was his style, the piece had a sunshine-shaped head with a smiling face on both the front and back and upraised hands. The artist is known for creating small items like birdhouses as well as larger architectural forms. This happy figure was taken with a final bid of $155.

Above: Stan Bitters created this 9 inch tall Sun Person sculpture in terracotta glazed earthenware. This contemporary piece was taken with a final bid of $155.

Above: A 6 inch tall redware ugly face spittoon signed by artist Michael Crocker that bore the artist's signature was rehomed with a final bid of $65

An exceptionally well made antique primitive early American rolling factory shoe rack constructed of sturdy oak earned high honors at this varied auction. The six wood shelves were expertly assembled, and the original industrial casters were still connected and functional. Standing 55 inches tall by 21 inches wide, it was ready to move on to its next assignment with a final bid of $275. Another early American antique wood item was also very eagerly claimed. This massive pine farmhouse pie safe with porcelain knobs on the double doors and original wood latches featured mesh on the front and sides to allow air flow. It measured 48 inches tall by 51 inches wide. Some cracks developed in the wood top over time, but most of the structure was in stable condition and earned a final bid of $195. Other antique pantry cabinets or jelly cupboards closed from $105-175.

Above: A Dutch Delft ceramic multi spout vase with the words "Delft Handwerx Holland" written under the base sold for $80.

A cleverly designed 18th century antique country primitive Queen Anne pine tilt top tavern table/bench was another example of furniture that had a history yet was ready for a new location. This impressive item measured 51 inches wide and 31 inches deep in the table position. When not in use as a table the top tilted back. This exposed a bench with the raised tabletop becoming a chair back. This sturdy relic was rehomed with a final bid of $120.

To provide romantic lighting during dinner, a set of two wall-mount vintage Colonial Revival mirrored tole tin sconces consisted of several reflective surfaces to allow the light from their candles to shine in varying patterns. They were equipped with bands on the back for easy mounting and the reflectors measured 12 inches tall. This lovely set in good condition finished at $130.

Aprons

hand-made. While aprons were available to purchase from stores through most of the 20th century, many people in the 1940s and '50s made their own, often using one of McCall's or Simplicity's sewing patterns. Often these "everyday" aprons were adorned with ribbon, lace, appliqué, or embroidery to bring a touch of beauty and grace into the kitchen.

These beautiful details that are found on vintage aprons have helped elevate aprons from kitchen necessities to American folk art.

Above: Extremely rare and fun, this 19th century girl's apron is shaped like a bunny rabbit and is valued at $150.

Everyday aprons from the 1800s through about 1950 were hand-sewed using simple compositions.

Not too long ago, vintage aprons were considered a "dime a dozen" commodity since no one collected them and everyone thought they were just pieces of scrap that needed thrown away. All of that has changed. On the secondary market today, expect to pay about $35 on average for a quality, vintage apron in good condition and with good coloring, and expect to pay hundreds of dollars for a rare or one-of-a-kind apron.

Also expect to find aprons with tears and stains. Stains were inevitable since women cooked and served in their aprons. A food stain that has sat a long time in an apron can still be removed, so don't let a little staining detract from owning a fine old apron. Tears are another matter. Examine the tear carefully. If a seam has come undone, it can be re-stitched. But if the tear is in the middle of the apron, any repair you do will be visible. Visible repairs detract greatly from the value of vintage aprons, so make certain that any torn apron that you buy will truly enhance your collection in some way.

Aprons came in all styles. The most common apron has always been the half or skirt apron. A skirt apron tied at the waist and covered the front of a woman's dress. Another common style was the bib apron, which had a neck strap that tied in the back and a waist strap too. Bib aprons are still popular at barbeques since they offer protection from splatters from a cook's neck to knees. Hostess aprons are sought after by collectors since hostess aprons were made of lightweight materials, such as organdy or netting. Hostess aprons provided minimum protection while accessorizing to the point of fashion. Women often added ribbons or lace to hostess aprons, believing that it added a touch of class. Today, hostess aprons still look classy when displayed.

Aprons also add class to collections and not just apron collections. The common apron is a cross-collectible piece of clothing that adds both color and substance to textile collections, kitchen-ware collections, and simply 1940s or '50s memorabilia collections.

Some collectors enjoy searching for souvenir aprons since most roadside stands of the 1950s sold commemorative aprons with maps or tourist attractions on them. Some of these souvenir aprons are quite rare and valuable. Other collectors search for vintage mother/daughter matching aprons or aprons that came with matching potholders.

Novice apron collectors should decide what it is they want to collect, and try to limit their search to their specialty.

The popularity of vintage aprons and their appeal as historic, decorative items continues to grow as more and more collectors seek out these fascinating pieces of cloth that women all over America once tied on.

Above: This vintage pink and green floral apron with matching potholders was offered for $10.

Above: From the late-1950s, this Simplicity "one yard" apron pattern originally sold for 45 cents. It is now valued at $18.

Collectors are giving vintage luggage labels some new mileage

By William Flood

Perhaps you're browsing an antique show or estate sale, rummaging through boxes of old paper. Amid faded sheet music and old postcards, something catches your eye: small, colorful stickers adorned with bold images of grand hotels, majestic steamships, and propeller-driven airliners.

These little works of art are vintage luggage labels, sometimes called luggage stickers. Once used to promote hotels and transportation lines, they've become a fascinating niche within the paper-collecting hobby, recalling the Golden Age of Travel.

In their day, porters, bellhops, and transit staff pasted these stickers onto travelers' steamer trunks and hard-sided luggage. The labels ensured baggage got enroute while acting as miniature billboards for destinations and carriers. For passengers, they gave a nod to travel tastes, and social standing. A suitcase covered in labels from Swiss ski resorts or luxury ocean liners signaled a well-heeled life.

Today, these small pieces preserve memories of a travel world largely gone: hotels and resorts offering elegance that modern hospitality struggles to match; exotic destinations like Cuba or Zanzibar that travelers can no longer visit; and elegant journeys aboard ships, trains, and aircraft that connected far-flung destinations.

Originally, luggage labels served a simple purpose. As train and steamship travel grew, baggage handlers needed a way to identify the many trunks passing through busy stations and ports. Labels helped staff ensure luggage reached the right place.

Above: This lot of over three dozen hotel and airline labels was just $35.

Hotels and transportation companies soon saw another use for the labels: advertising. They began producing colorful versions promoting their businesses and the places they served. The label moved with the suitcase, turning every stop into an opportunity for exposure.

Hotels were among the first to embrace the idea. Many labels featured the hotel's name, location, and an illustration of the property. Steamship lines followed, promoting their vessels, routes, and destinations. Railways, large and small, did the same, advertising their trains and scenic excursions. Commercial aviation came next. Beginning in the 1920s, airlines used the stickers to introduce their names to a public just becoming familiar with air travel. German examples even promoted Zeppelin airships. Eventually major carriers like Lufthansa and Pan American joined in. The practice eventually spread to motor-coach operators, local resorts, and tourist attractions. Even national parks printed luggage labels as promotional tools.

Advances in commercial printing lowered printing costs and made luggage labels more colorful and detailed. Around the turn of the 20th century, designs increasingly featured local landmarks and landscapes, often mimicking popular travel posters. A hotel in Cairo might showcase the pyramids, while a Swiss resort might feature the Alps. The goal was to promote not just lodging or transportation, but the destination itself, enticing travelers to visit.

Designs also reflected the changing artistic styles of their times. Labels from around 1900 sported Art Nouveau flourishes, while those from the 1920s and 1930s embraced the geometry and distinctive lettering of Art Deco. By the 1950s, modernist elements showcased the futuristic imagery of the Jet Age.

Some of the finest labels came from accomplished commercial illustrators. One Italian printing house, Richter & Company, became well known for its hotel labels.

Right: Rare luggage labels can command hundreds of dollars, as this mint Germany Graf Zeppelin example illustrates at $429.

Its principal illustrator, Mario Borgoni (1869–1936), created many of its celebrated designs. His work remains particularly popular with collectors. American illustrator Dan Sweeney (1880–1958) was another notable name. During the 1920s and 1930s, he produced labels for prestigious hotels in the Far East, from Hong Kong to Manila. His illustrations were among the first to feature local architecture.

The decline of decorative luggage labels began

Vintage Luggage Labels

after World War II as commercial aviation transformed travel. Heavy steamer trunks and hard-sided suitcases gave way to lighter, soft-sided bags, most made from materials poorly suited to adhesive labels. Travel was becoming less luxurious and more routine, leaving hospitality employees little incentive to attach promotional labels to individual bags. Meanwhile, independent hotels increasingly gave way to larger chains, reducing the need for individual property promotion. By the mid-1960s, standardized baggage tags designed solely for identification and tracking had largely replaced the colorful labels of earlier decades.

Vintage luggage labels hold a special place among collectors of travel memorabilia, particularly those drawn to what has been called the "four pillars" of the Golden Age of Travel: grand hotels, steamships, railways, and early airlines. Many collectors develop a focus in one category.

Hotel labels are popular, especially those from celebrated establishments like Paris's Le Grand Hôtel or Cairo's Shepheard's Hotel. Labels from locations that have changed culturally, like colonial Hong Kong or pre-statehood Hawaii, hold special appeal.

Steamship collectors favor labels from prominent ocean-liner companies like Cunard and White Star, especially those featuring famous vessels. Railway collectors seek labels from major domestic lines like the B&O and Santa Fe, smaller railways, and international lines such as Canadian Pacific and the Orient Express. Airline collectors prize early labels from pioneering carriers like Pan American, particularly those depicting propeller-driven aircraft that evoke aviation's early decades.

Other hobbyists build their collections around geography, seeking labels from various destinations like the Pacific islands or British colonies. Others focus on artistic styles, with Art Deco examples especially popular. Some seek examples with historical significance, such as commemorating early transatlantic flights, automobile clubs, or destinations shaped by historical change.

Affordability is an appealing aspect of collecting luggage labels. Common examples from the postwar travel boom through the 1960s often sell for $2-$10 apiece. Established hotels, airlines, and railroads produced them in large quantities, making them relatively easy to find. Yet, their abundance doesn't diminish their appeal; their subjects and graphics can make even an inexpensive label a worthwhile addition to a collection.

Left: Luggage labels can be surprisingly affordable: this near-mint, NOS 1940 TWA Boeing 307 Stratoliner example was just $6.00.

Older and scarcer labels can command higher prices. Desirable examples from the late 19th and early 20th centuries may sell for $50-$70, while particularly rare pieces can fetch several hundred dollars. Collectors prize labels associated with storied hotels, famous steamships, and pioneering airlines, as well as those which promoted businesses that operated only briefly.

Artwork is another influence. Labels rife with period visuals often command premiums. Those created by recognized commercial illustrators - like Borgoni and Sweeney- are particularly prized by experienced collectors.

Condition plays a natural role in value. Collectors often favor unused labels, commonly called new old stock (NOS), which retain their original paper backing and adhesive and were never applied to luggage. Some survived in company storerooms after being discontinued, while others were saved by travelers who requested extras as souvenirs.

Used labels still offer appeal. Those attached to a suitcase or trunk offer a glimpse into a person's journeys, adding character to the piece. Even labels removed from luggage can be desirable despite some wear or damage, particularly if rare.

A word of warning: reproductions are common. When shopping for rare or expensive examples, pay attention to the paper, printing techniques, colors, and appearance. An overly perfect finish, paper that's too clean, or printing that suggests modern technology are all giveaways. Original unused labels may be nicely preserved, but they will still show the patina of their age.

A good place to find labels is ephemera shows. They're often in sellers' box lots, often at bargain prices. Dealers specializing in travel memorabilia may also have albums full of labels for collectors to browse. Some of the shows worth considering are: The Columbus Paper, Postcard and Book Show in Hilliard, Ohio; the Greater Chicago Postcard & Paper Show; and the long-running Allentown Paper Show in Pennsylvania. More serious collectors may also enjoy the Ephemera Society of America's annual fair in Old Greenwich, Connecticut.

Antiquarian bookstores with ephemera sections are another good source. Online, AbeBooks (abebooks.com) is a useful resource for vintage paper, including luggage labels. Collectors seeking rarer examples can also explore specialized dealers such as London's Sotheran's (sotherans.co.uk).

For those interested in travel history, luggage labels offer a fascinating collecting pursuit. Each preserves a glimpse of journeys, destinations, and familiar names from another era, when a suitcase could carry a story. It's a rewarding corner of antiques collecting, with plenty left to discover.

Above: Enticing graphics, like the 1945 Clipper featured on this Pan Am Latin American route sticker ($18), help make vintage luggage labels so collectible.

Below: An early unadorned variety of luggage sticker, issued by Australian National Railways, was priced at $10.
