Cordero figures tell a story

BY LARRY LEMASTERS

Oral tradition is the time-honored way Native Americans first passed values and beliefs to the next generation. In lieu of a written language, storytellers would rely on their verbal language to share their history, customs, rituals and legends through vivid narratives. Mothers and fathers alike would sit around campfires and tell stories to their children. Some of these stories, much like Aesop's Fables, revealed moral decisions, thus guiding children toward living a good and virtuous life.

Helen Cordero (June 15, 1915 – July 24, 1994) of Cochiti Pueblo, New Mexico, is credited with creating the first Native American storyteller figurine in 1964. She wanted this storyteller figurine to represent the way her grandfather, Santiago Quintana, would sit her on his lap when she was young and tell stories to her and others gathered around them. She remembered her grandfather as a "great story teller," and the first storyteller figurine was of him and five of his grandchildren gathered around him to hear him tell stories.

Of her work, Cordero once said, "All my potteries come out of my heart. I talk to them. They're my little people, not just pretty things I make for money." Her "talking" to her clay dolls reflects the Pueblo belief that clay is a living substance, making the figurines similar to small human beings.

Right: Another original Helen Cordero storyteller clay figurine, circa 1960s. This 11-inch tall, powerful figurine depicts a grandfather telling stories to ten children of the Pueblo. It is valued at $12,000.

The Pueblo "singing mother" motif greatly influenced Cordero's storyteller figurines. Historically, Cochiti women potters produced figurines from clay of

Architectural antiques stolen from Ben Hur Building

BY WILLIAM FLOOD

CRAWFORDSVILLE, Ind. — In August thieves broke into Crawfordsville's Ben Hur Building, which is undergoing redevelopment, and stole multiple architectural artifacts.

In what was undoubtedly a scrap metal crime, the thieves took both common recyclable metal and metal architectural elements. Jonathan Anderson, principal of AP Development LLC, the Indianapolis-based company doing the renovation, said items taken included original door handles, railings, metal elevator trim, and mail slots. Anderson noted the stolen artifacts were important to their National Parks Standards restoration.

The artifacts are easily recognizable. Several of the stolen pieces dated to the building's 1911 construction. Multiple brass Art Nouveau door handles with the raised inscription "TBH" for "Tribe of Ben Hur" were taken. The door handles reference the insurance company that constructed the building. A 97-inch iron Art Nouveau stair railing with a distinctive pattern along with a complimentary pilaster; and, several brass mail slots, taken from interior doors, that have the raised word "Letters" on the flap were also stolen.

Also stolen were elements added during a circa-1940 update that added Art Deco flair to the building. The thieves were successful at taking a Streamline Moderne stainless steel floor indicator for the elevator but were unable to steal the door faces or surrounding door trim. They also took metal mail drops from floors 2-5 imprinted with raised "US Mail" on their faces.

The stolen elements were integral to the interior of the five-story neoclassical building. The terracotta-faced Ben Hur Life Insurance Building, located at the intersection of Main and Water streets, was constructed in 1911 as the headquarters for the Supreme Tribe of Ben-Hur, a mutual benefit society that provided life insurance to its members. The building was named after General Lew Wallace's famous 1880 novel, Ben Hur. Wallace, who sat on the Lincoln assassination trial, also served as Governor of the New Mexico Territory from 1878-1881 and was Minister to Turkey from 1881-1885. He also lived in Crawfordsville for many years.

The Ben Hur fraternity was incorporated in 1894 and once had over 100,000 members. In 1930, the entity changed its name to the Ben-Hur Life Association. By 1990, the fraternity had been disbanded in favor of a mutual insurance company, USA Life One Insurance Company of Indiana. That company women with children known as “Singing Mother.” Cordero morphed the singing mother motif into storyteller women and men surrounded by children. Each of her storyteller dolls shows a whimsical storyteller with his or her mouth open, telling Pueblo stories.

Having originally worked in leather, she began, in the 1950s, making clay birds and animals since clay was cheaper to work in than leather. Cordero’s aunt suggested she make figurines when her early attempts at bowls and jars were continually misshapen.

In an interview in 1981, Cordero expressed that she created her own version of the storyteller in 1964, and then “I made some more of my Storytellers with lots of children climbing on him to listen. I took them up to the Santo Domingo Feast Day.”

Alexander Girard saw

her work at the Feast Day and became an early patron and collector of her storyteller figurines. Girard influenced the direction and appearance of Cordero’s work by suggesting she increase both the production rate and size of her storytellers.

Cordero is also famous for keeping traditional Pueblo pottery practices alive. She followed the traditional Pueblo way by digging her own clay and hand-preparing her own coloring pigments. Near Cochiti Pueblo, she found three different types of clay and many of the traditional plants used as coloring agents by Native Americans.

Her husband and son drove 100 miles to bring home the cedar wood she used to fire her pieces on an open iron grate behind her house. She enlisted nearly all of her family at different times to help in the making of storyteller figurines, especially in the painting of the dolls.

Cordero developed a trademark face for her storyteller dolls. And an easy field test to tell if one of her storyteller figurines is from her early or late work is to study the children. When she first began making storyteller figurines, the children and storyteller were all part of a single lump of clay, but as her work became more refined, she made her children separate from the storyteller so that she could more easily place them around the storyteller. Unfortunately, some of Cordero’s earliest storyteller dolls remained unsigned, so proof of artist can sometimes be a problem. As other artists copied her style, she began to sign all of her work.

Today, many Native American artists follow in Helen Cordero’s footsteps, continuing with the storyteller dolls that Cordero first created. It has been estimated that by the 1990s when Cordero died, there were over 200 potters making storyteller figurines. Modern collectors love the variations that different artists offer in the dolls, but the true golden era of storyteller dolls will always be centered on Cordero’s work and legacy. She not only created a wonderful artistic expression, she also continued Native American culture for generations to come. It is easy to see why storyteller dolls have captured the imagination of collectors for over 60 years now. These dolls celebrate the tapestry of the Pueblo way of life, encapsulated into a tiny clay figure.

The importance of Cordero’s work is found in the long list of art museums that display storyteller dolls. Her work is found in the Museum of International Folk Art, the New Mexico Museum of Art in Santa Fe, the Texas Tech University Art Museum in Lubbock, the Smithsonian Art Museum in Washington, DC, the Heard Museum in Phoenix, the Bandelier National Monument museum in Los Alamos, and the Brooklyn Museum of Art to name a few.

For more information on Cordero and her “children,” check out “Helen Cordero and The Storytellers of the Cochiti Pueblo,” 1995, by Nancy Howard. It is a fascinating book about Cordero, her storytellers, and her ability to tell stories with them.

operated from Fishers, Indiana, and the Ben Hur building was leased to various commercial tenants. By 2005, the building was vacant and in dire need of rehabilitation.

AP Development is renovating the landmark as the centerpiece in the city’s Indiana Stellar Communities Designation plan intended to revitalize the downtown and attract professionals back to the city. Following an approximately $13 million renovation, the building will have 60 apartments and retail space on the first floor. Construction is set to begin this year

Anderson wants to convey that anything offered for sale from the Ben Hur building is stolen and not legitimately salvaged. A reward is offered for information leading to the return of the collection. He hopes that someone has seen - or will see - these items somewhere. “I just want these items back so that our restoration of the Ben Hur building will be complete,” Anderson said. Barring their return, he’s researched having the pieces reconstructed. “That’s a matter of cost,” he acknowledged.

Anyone with information should contact Jon Anderson at 317-294-4905 or via email at janderson@andersonpartnersllc.com

Hood ornaments have moved from radiator caps to collectors

BY DOUG GRAVES

In the 1980s hood ornaments became a fashion statement. Rap- pers wore them like giant charms at the end of gold chains. Some peo- ple followed suit by stealing them right off the hoods of cars.

Hood ornaments were highly decorative and helped make cars stand out from each other. They were usually cast in brass, zinc or bronze, and finished in a chrome-plated finish. During the years when chrome plate was unavailable, they were plated in either silver or nickel.

Over time their popu- larity waned. Perhaps the biggest factor in the downfall of hood orna- ments was safety. Europe led the charge

Left: Most radiator caps were not lavish at all. In fact, they were nothing more than screw-on caps with no design. Pontiac, however, designed their caps in the likeness of an Ottawa chief. Pontiac's Indian design began with the cap shown here in 1930, and the design last- ed through the 1950s. (photo submitted)

with new pedestrian safety regulations. The idea was to keep that fancy bit of metal from seriously injuring a per- son during a collision. It might be the least of your worries if you're hit by a car, but it was a start.

To understand why car hood ornaments were once the standard one needs to look at how cars were designed in the early 20th century. Early automobiles had their radiator caps out- side of the hood and just above the grille. These radiator caps aren't par- ticularly attractive, so automakers started using hood ornaments to dress them up and make them pretty. It was mostly about aesthetics. Any design would be much more appealing than boring old radiator caps.

When radiator caps were moved under the hood, hood ornaments remained atop the front of the vehicle, becoming a 'fashion statement' and identifier for the automaker.

Some of the more recognizable car hood ornaments include the Jaguar Leaper, Bugatti Dancing Elephant, Bent- ley Flying B and Rolls-

Royce Spirit of Ecstasy. However, even more affordable brands once had a little something extra out on the hood.

Hood ornaments (or car mascots as they are known in the U.K.), were quite popular in the 1920s, 1930s, 1940s and 1950s. Many hood orna- ments were themed to reflect the most power- ful, or modern, technolo- gy of the times. For example, locomotives adorned cars in the 1930s while airplanes, torpedoes and gun sights appeared in the 1940s. Jet aircraft and rockets made their appearance in the 1950s. These tech- nology imageries cou- pled with several other stylized shapes and themes inspired a wide array of hood sculptures that still fascinate col- lectors today.

Women were also pop- ular ornaments. In the 1930s Cadillac adorned its hoods with a winged woman. Buick hood ornaments were characterized by stylized versions of female figures (early 1930s), locomotives (late 1930s), airplanes (early 1940s), gun sights (late 1940s to mid-1950s) and jet fighters (mid to late 1950s).

The Chevrolet Motor Company incorporated the eagle ornament in its line of cars from the late 1920s to early 1930s. In the 1930s and 1940s, it added the locomotive to its designs, before turned to the impala design in the early 1950s. Gun sights were used in the late 1950s.

In 1926, General Motors introduced a modestly-priced car line produced in Pontiac, Michigan (so named after a famous Ottawa chief). So, it's no surprise that throughout the 1930s, 1940s and Below: A real rarity is this hood ornament from a Graham-Paige automobile (1929-1932). Graham-Paige was an American automobile manufacturer that got its start in Evansville, Indiana before opening plants in Detroit, Michigan and Stockton, California in 1922. The company ceased operating in 1940. (photo submitted)

Above: French artist and designer Rene Lalique mold-pressed glass and used an acid-etching process to make radiator caps to fit the taste of motorists in the 1920s and 1930s. The one shown here was designed in 1928. (photo submitted)

1950s, car hoods would be adorned with sleek variations of a "chief" with the head-dress motif.

The Plymouth automobile was introduced in 1928 by the Chrysler Corporation. From the 1930s to the early 1950s, Plymouth hood ornaments were typically characterized by stylized sailing ships or schoolers.

Rolls-Royce is one of the few automakers left today that still uses a hood ornament to adorn the front of its cars. It's called the Spirit of Ecstasy, an elegantly winged woman that appears to lean into a constant headwind.

The Rolls Royce ornament was designed from an original radiator cap statuette sculpted for Lord Montagu of Beaulieu, modeled after his mistress Eleanor Velasco Thornton. Rolls Royce's hood ornaments were actually silver plated through 1914, but their frequent theft caused the company to switch to stainless steel.

Mercedes-Benz how has its three-pointed star prominently displayed on the grille. It's even subtly backlit at night so no one can miss the fact that you're driving a Benz.

Some car makers chose to use animals in their ornaments, like the Packard swan, the Mac Truck bulldog, the Dodge ram's head, or the Ford greyhound. Many other hood ornaments were created to represent ancient civilizations or mythological characters, like Armstrong Siddeley's sphinx and Cadillac's winged goddess.

During the 1920s, the illustrious glass studio of Rene Lalique introduced a series of beautifully sculpted radiator covers (and eventually hood ornaments) featuring classical deities and animal figures. These ornaments, which could be used to customize any standard car, ranged from "The Archer," to a flat disc engraved with a nude Grecian bow hunter, to a stylized row of leaping glass horses.

"The most valuable are the glass ornaments by Rene Lalique," said Sandy Erdman an appraiser from Winona, Minn. "In mint condition, they sell for thousands of dollars each. They are designed for Citroens, Butattis, Bentleys and others. With any collectible, the rarity of Lalique pieces has also led to many fakes, as most collectors cannot afford a Lalique."

One of Lalique's most popular designs, "The Dragonfly," included a lighted, multicolored mechanism beneath its base, which revolved as the car moved to cast various shades of light up through the clear glass statue. By 1932, Lalique was offering 46 different radiator cap designs in its annual catalog.

One can expect to pay $1,000 for a Jaguar Mark 7 hood ornament, up to $400 for a 1939 Dodge leaping ram ornament, $500 for a Lincoln Greyhound ornament or $350 for a 1934 Chevrolet ornament. Of course, much less for all of these if they're in imperfect condition.

Hood ornaments are not cheap. But then, they're much less expensive than the vintage four-wheeler they adorned.
