Collectors love going 'into the woods' to find treasures

BY SUSAN
EMERSON NUTTER

COLUMBIANA, Ohio - When the morning air becomes brisk. When the goldenrod swaths farm fields in yellow; when trucks and vans pull up to the acres of trees outside of Columbiana, Ohio... it's time for Antiques in the Woods & Vintage Too. This year's event took place Sept. 12-13.

For more than 40 years, shoppers have been attending this show to look for vintage and antique items; a place where "a walk in the woods" takes on a whole new meaning. Under the management of antique dealers Michelle and Rege Monstrola; who took on this responsibility three years ago, Antiques in the Woods & Vintage Too surpassed expectations despite a rainstorm; or two.

"The show continues to grow which is wonderful," Michelle said. "This year we filled 110 booths; up from 91 booths in 2025." Understand the term "booth" has a different meaning at Antiques in the Woods. Each dealer

Halloween masks can take you to the White House

BY LARRY
LEMASTERS

Halloween has changed over the years, but two events during the mid-20th century helped create a revolution in how adults saw Halloween and their willingness to participate in Halloween costume parties.

The first event took place on Oct. 30, 1958, when First Lady Mamie Eisenhower decorated the White House for Halloween for the first time. Decorations used by the First Lady included skeletons hanging from the wall lights, shocks of dried corn, and orange jack-o-lanterns scattered around the State Dining Room where a Halloween luncheon was served.

The second event is a foundational myth about presidential Halloween masks. History reports that in 1969, thousands of anti-Vietnam war protestors gathered to march the day before Richard Nixon's inauguration. While marching in front of the White House, one of the protestors donned a Richard Nixon mask. The New York Times photographed the young man wearing the mask and wrote, "He marched the entire 20 block distance in a mime of picking his nose" while wearing the Nixon mask. It has been said that this 20-block moment in time spawned the presidential mask, and since the Nixon era.

Professor Jack Santino, author of Halloween and

Other Festivals of Death and Life said in his book, "It is easy to romanticize the symbolism behind space is actually a structure – a tiny house of sorts, with some having an added porch or lean-to. Some structures include two or three rooms. No two are alike. All are placed along gravel paths and tucked into acres and acres of woods; so at this show, one truly needs a map to see everything, and meandering is encouraged. “You never know what you will find around the next turn,” Michelle said with a smile.

Primitives and early advertising intermingle with mid-century modern pieces, jewelry, garden décor and stoneware. The variety of items from differing eras is the main lure of this event, along with the setting, the wonderful food vendors, and live music.

“We want the show to be a destination,” Michelle explains. “One where shoppers do come back the second day because there was so much to see and they want a second look.” Michelle and Rege encourage that return visit via selfie taking. “We have a backdrop inside the show, that if you take a selfie in front of it once you’ve paid the Saturday admission fee, you get in free on Sunday when you show that selfie to our ticket takers.”

Besides an uptick in dealer participation this year, management also offered porting services for easy removal of larger items. “Everyone really appreciated that free service so it will be back next year,” Michelle said.

Shopping this show is an adventure as prices for items are as inexpensive as 50 cents but can also reach $10,000 mark. Dennis Leach of Central City, CO, had that $10,000 item – a Power-lube Motor Oil porcelain sign complete with the company’s prowling tiger logo. He also had a Power-lube Motor Oil can priced $3,000. Leach said this company first pumped oil after World War I but eventually faded out in the 1930s.

Mark Hamilton of Ellwood City, Pa., brought along an item fitting not only for the woods but for the upcoming holiday season. On display in Hamilton’s booth was a wonderful painted brass figural of a wild turkey priced $200. It had a “National Wild Turkey Federation” seal on its wooden base as well as a metal plaque stating “The Survivor” by artist Greg O’Neal and that it was number 1316 of an edition of 2,600.

Reasonably priced items filled the dealer space of Vintystash of Lisbon, Ohio. Two pieces of green Fenton custard or satin uranium glass that glowed under blacklight were available. The art glass ruffled rim vase with hand-painted daisies was $50 as was a ruffled compote. A Northwood Carnival glass “tree trunk” vase also wore a $50 price tag.

Anthony Worrellia of Youngstown, Ohio, is known for his love of all things holiday, especially Halloween. He had a variety of early papier-mache pumpkins priced from $150 to $350. The booth of Bert Rossi of Mercer, Pa., featured a wall of canine art with Scotties, terriers, and setters being most prevalent. Some were prints, some were oil on board – all were charming and priced from $8 to $40.

It seemed like collections of items were in many dealer spaces. Herb and Cherly Renner of Berlin, Ohio, had a plethora of wooden sleds with metal runners most priced around the $25 to $30 mark. Jeff Wasylychyn of Youngstown, Ohio, boasted an entire herd of brass deer. The larger standing examples were $200 as was the larger deer that was lying down. The smaller deer were more in the $50 price range.

Michael Johnson of Painesville, Ohio, filled four small structures

with items even spilling out into the areas around each tiny home. A taxidermy of a mountain lion sold early Saturday, but still available a full-size metal painted baptismal font priced $1,895 and a 232-drawer wooden cabinet from a defunct auto parts store which was tagged $3,595.

“We were so pleased with what was in the woods this year,” Michelle said. “And we are so thankful for everyone involved. We could not do this show without them. We were disappointed with the rain, but appreciate shoppers for dodging raindrops at times, and were happy to see so many buyers leaving the woods with packages.”

Mark your calendar now. Next year’s Antiques in the Woods & Vintage Too will take place Sept. 11-12.

Above: It seems only fitting this herd of brass deer would be displayed with Santa! The Coca-Cola Santa was priced $200. Deer were tagged from $50 to $200. All were in the dealer space of Jeff Wasylychyn of Youngstown, Ohio.

Above: Dogs on display made up one of the dealer space of Bert Rossi of Mercer, Pa. The colorful oil on board of the two setters was $30, while the black and white print of terriers “Sandy and Jock” signed by the artist was $30.

Above: The little house filled with items offered by Chuck and Joyce McElwain of Aenold, Pa., is a wonderful example of the dealer set-ups at Antiques in the Wood & Vintage Too.

Collectors get their money’s worth with trade tokens

BY WILLIAM FLOOD

You may have seen them at an antique show: little objects that look like coins, but upon closer inspection, clearly aren’t. Instead of the name of a government, they might bear the name of a company or store, along with words or symbols that hint at what they were used for. What you may have come across are trade tokens, and for collectors, they offer inexpensive access to owning a small piece of commercial history.

Trade tokens were privately issued pieces that were used in place of money or as a form of credit. Businesses issued them to be redeemed for merchandise, drinks, services, and, in some cases, as part of a company’s system of paying their workers. Today, they are part of a collecting field known as exonumia, which includes tokens, medals, and other coin-like pieces that aren’t regular government-issued coins.

Their use goes back centuries, but trade tokens became especially common during industrialization in the 19th and early 20th centuries, when growing businesses, factories, and mines needed convenient ways to handle small transactions and credit that didn’t involve currency.

The basic idea was simple: a merchant issued a token promising a certain value when it was brought back to the business. Tokens were not official money, generally could not be used outside the issuing firm, and did no contain any precious metal. Their value came solely from the issuing business.

Factories and mines were among the most common users of trade tokens. Company-store tokens, often called scrip (scrip is

Company scrip was especially common in remote mining and factory towns, where cash could be scarce. These pieces interest collectors because they document the realities of company-town life and preserve the names of businesses and communities that have since changed or disappeared.

Trade tokens were not solely issued by factories or mines. A general store might issue tokens as a form of credit, encouraging customers to return to the store to spend them. A restaurant or saloon might have provided tokens redeemable for particular items. A hotel or even an entity like a carnival might have employed them as a promotional device. For the issuing business, there were some distinct advantages over real currency: A token with a merchant's name kept the business's name circulating long after a transaction, and a customer holding a token had a reason to come back. Plus, if a token was never redeemed, the business didn't have to ante up the goods or services promised by the token.

Right: Trade tokens were not always round. This oval-shaped one ($8) is a bit uncommon.

Tokens often carried typical denominations such as 5-cents, 10-cents, or 25-cents. Others read something like "Good for 5¢ in Trade" or "Good for One Drink." These are sometimes called "good-fors," a term collectors still use today.

Trade tokens also had another important use: They filled in when regular coins were hard to come by. This happened during periods of coin shortages, most famously during the Civil War, when people hoarded government coins that were taken out of circulation due to rising demand for metal during the war. The result was a shortage of small change. Merchants and others responded by issuing privately made tokens that

Most were made from inexpensive materials such as brass and bronze, although later examples can be found in cardboard, rubber, and wood. Many of the latter appeared as familiar "wooden nickels." Most were round, but octagonal and scalloped pieces were common. Unusual shapes could distinguish a token from official coins or other local tokens, and sometimes help thwart counterfeiting.

The information stamped onto a token usually has more appeal than the materials or shape. Tokens often identified the issuing business, town, denomination, or "Good For" value. Some included an address or image of the business. Many also bore the name or initials of the manufacturer - two of the more popular being Scovill Manufacturing Co. and Whitehead & Hoag.

For today's collector, those details are a big part of the enjoyment of the hobby. Trade tokens often carry details about where and when they were issued.

Such details supply a good starting point for researching how and why the token was used. Yet, there are examples with little or no identifying information - referred to as mavericks - and for some collectors, figuring out what unidentified tokens were used for is one of the entertaining facets of the hobby.

Trade tokens were intended for a limited audience. A token issued by a factory in one town was unlikely to circulate far beyond it, and when the business closed, or the token was no longer used, there was little the holder could do with it. Many were discarded, while others were left behind in old buildings, stores and homes, where they would eventually be discovered by later generations. That's good news for collectors: trade tokens still turn up in old collections and estates, and because so many businesses issued their own pieces, new discoveries are always possible.

There are plenty of approaches to collecting trade tokens. Many collectors start with one interesting piece, and those originating from one's hometown can be particularly enjoyable. A token from a former local business can be a lot more appealing than a piece from an unknown entity halfway across the country.

Collectors typically settle into various niches. Some collect tokens from certain types of businesses, such as saloons or coal mines, while others look for those from particular eras or locations, like the Old West.

Rarity matters, but the story behind a token can be just as appealing. A common piece from a well-known factory, small-town business, or vanished industry can offer a fascinating glimpse into the past. Condition also isn't everything. A worn token with an unusual history may be more interesting than a pristine example with little else of appeal. For many collectors, the ideal find combines uniqueness, condition, and a good story.

Fortunately, collecting trade tokens isn't generally an expensive hobby. That makes them an appealing choice for collectors who don't want to spend a lot of money on a hobby. Common examples can often be found in the $3 to $50 range. Graded examples will typically run $50 or more. Scarcer examples and those with particular historical merit can command prices in the hundreds and even low thousands of dollars.

What began as a practical way for businesses to handle trade, credit, and even shortages of official currency has become a way for collectors to explore the businesses and communities behind them. Tokens that once had value only at a particular store, factory, or mine now have an entirely different kind of value - as tangible links to the past.

Below: Just like real coins, trade tokens had different information on the face and reverse. That often included the identification of the company and denomination.

masks and costumes, yet holidays like Halloween showcase people’s fascination with engaging in parody and social critique.” Santino would say, wearing a mask of Nixon as parody is one of the greatest forms of social critique a citizen may put forth.

Halloween started as an adult holiday that gave adults the opportunity to play dress up and assume costumed alter egos of heroes and villains. By the late Victorian Era, there was a movement throughout America to transform Halloween into a community holiday where neighborly get-togethers pushed aside the need for ghosts, pranks and witchcraft. By the turn of the 20th century, Halloween parties were for both adults and their children, and elaborate adult costumes became a fun way to celebrate All Hollow’s Eve.

In the early part of the 20th century, adult Masquerade costumes slowly gave way to children seeking candy on Halloween. But it wasn’t until the early 1930s that children’s Halloween costumes first appeared in department and Five & Dime stores.

By the end of Worl War II and the start of the Baby Boomer generation, Halloween became a night of “tricks or treats” where children roamed in frightening, creepy, or playful costumes. In the mid-1950s, marketing companies witnessed the demand for store-bought costumes, and companies began turning out a witch’s pot full of vampires, ghosts, cartoon characters, presidential, and witchy costumes.

History does repeat itself, so by the late 20th century, adult Halloween parties where all participants came in costume again became commonplace in and around Halloween. Presidential masks became popular for these adult parties. Costume manufacturers, such as Ben Cooper, quickly recognized the growing consumer demand for political masks and full costumes.

It wasn’t until about 1990 that collectors starting seriously looking at Halloween costumes and masks as collectible items.

Today, presidential mask collectors look for vintage as well as new masks since the idea of a presidential mask collecting is to collect at least one of every president, so the collector is always looking for whatever masks are out there. Vintage companies such as Halco of New York, Collegeville, Ben Cooper, and Rubies Costume Company, which pur-

Much of America’s social and political history has been played out in Halloween costumes and masks over the years. Collectors can “date” many presidential masks by the decade in which the president held office.
